Electric discharge machines are used for shaping materials by means of electric sparks generated between a tool electrode and a workpiece. According to U.S. Pat. No. 3,190,734 to Kamper, for example, an electrical conductor is driven at a high speed, and a tool electrode is brought to strike an armature. An arc is generated between the tool electrode and the armature, and the material is shaped. U.S. Pat. No. 3,282,675 to Kamper describes a tool electrode which is brought to strike an armature in a manner similar to that described above. U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,731,431 to Brinkman et al. and 3,987,487 to Denko et al. describe various electric discharge machines. Brinkman describes an electric discharge machine with a tool electrode and an armature on the same axis. Denko discloses a three-axis electric discharge machine. U.S. Pat. No. 4,055,944 to Janowic et al. describes a high-speed electric discharge machine with an electrode for each of a plurality of axes. According to Janowic, the U-shaped electrode is charged in a manner similar to that described for the single-axis machines. Because of the character of the electric discharge process, electric discharge machines generate considerable heat. In order to effectively use the heat for melting the workpiece, it is necessary to use an excessive amount of electric power. This leads to wasteful usage of electric power, and the operation of the machine becomes unstable. It is an object of the present invention to provide an electric discharge machine which heats the workpiece by generating a spark in an arc gap which does not expose the surface of the workpiece to a temperature exceeding the melting point of the material of the workpiece.package mts //Licensed under the Apache License, Version 2.0 (the "License"); //you may not use this file except in compliance with the License. //You may obtain a copy of the License at // // // //Unless required by applicable law or agreed to
