Particle filters for diesel engines are used to remove particles from the exhaust gas of diesel engines. The particles comprise very small solid particles as well as very small liquid particles that are present in the exhaust gas of the engine. The particle filter is arranged in the exhaust gas pipe of the engine, directly upstream of a catalytic converter. The filter is designed to retain the particles that are present in the exhaust gas, and to allow the gas to pass through the filter. The filter is therefore provided with a number of regularly arranged filter elements, each of which may be a layer of a filter material which traps the particles. The filter material is retained in the filter element on a perforated core plate. The number of filter elements in each filter is determined by the design stage. After a period of use, and in particular after prolonged, heavy use, the filter material of the filter elements becomes clogged. It is then necessary to remove the filter elements and replace them by new filter elements. The filtering function is then restored. The removal of the filter elements may be effected either manually or mechanically. In the case of manual removal, the individual filter elements are arranged at one side of the filter and the cover plate is opened and moved longitudinally towards the longitudinal axis of the filter, i.e. it is lifted from the exhaust pipe. The filter element can then be drawn out of the exhaust pipe through the cover plate. The removed element is usually arranged on a first-aid table where it can be examined and, if necessary, cleaned or repaired. In the case of mechanical removal, a scraping tool is usually used, the latter being placed into the interior of the filter in the closed position. Such a scraping tool is normally designed as a scraper blade. In particular, the blade has a collecting edge along which the clogged filter material is scraped off. The collected material is then removed from the filter interior, and the cleaning is repeated. In the case of mechanical removal of the elements, a specific problem arises at the location of
