Judge Barbara Crabb of the US District Court for the Northern District of California said the court lacked jurisdiction over the matter and ordered the previous agreement be approved. The matter dates back to the late 1970s, when Intel introduced its 8088 microprocessor, which cost US$1,395 and made it possible for Intel to dominate the world of PC microprocessors. It has been used by Intel, as well as rival chips like the 80286 and the x86 family – the family of microprocessors used in every PC today. The owners of the processors sued Intel in 1989, alleging the company had suppressed information that would have allowed them to make a $5,000 profit selling 8088s to customers who could then use them in the creation of new, compatible products. The class action case originally went to trial but Judge Crabb dismissed it without reaching a conclusion in 2010. She said at the time that issues of ownership were too complex and that owners of 8088s were not under a duty to bring their products up to the best, no-charge or free standards. That ruling didn't end the lawsuit. Instead, Intel's lawyers now took the court to
