1. Field of the Invention This invention pertains to a wrench for use in tightening latching engagement pin and locknut combinations, and more specifically to such a tool which is also a leveling device for use in the alignment of the two members so that they may be adjusted at their desired angular positions, and then tightened together. 2. Description of the Prior Art The tightening together of latching engagement pin and locknut combinations in a desired angular position and then tightening to lock them in that position is a task which has received much attention over the years. A wide variety of tools have been proposed which fall into two categories, namely, the so-called "standard" tools which are driven by hand or foot pressure, and other tools which are hand driven. A hand drive tool requires the user to rotate the tool relatively to the pin and nut so that the user has only one hand at disposal for use in the tightening process. In order to adjust the angular relationship of the nut to the pin, the user has no other hand with which to use as a level. Since, in the field of construction, the user may be lying on his back or other hard surface, the angular adjustment of the pin to the nut cannot be made accurately. Some prior art tools have handles which permit the user to use both hands as a level, however, the angle of the handle does not permit the desired angular relationship to be maintained, and even the alignment of the wrench by the user's body weight is difficult and not accurate. Thus, with prior art tools, the pin is generally inserted into the nut, and then the tension on the parts to be held in position is tried by a special type of wrench which is held by hand. The user must exert a considerable amount of force, and the alignment of the wrench on the pin and nut is made by the user's body weight. The use of a special wrench which is held by hand results in a loss of time for the user. Accordingly, it is seen that a need exists for a hand-held wrench which will permit the tightening of a latching engagement pin and locknut combination in a desired position, and thereafter, the angular relationship of the nut to the pin may be held while the tightening of the parts is accomplished by use of a pressure swing wrench. The patent to Katora, U.S. Pat. No. 3,826,472, issued on July 30, 1974, presents a tool which accomplishes a fitting of two members with

Ask HN: Who are the active Hacker News users and how does that compare to Digg? - joshuacc Let's say 50% of the users for HN have posted at least once, and 50% haven't. Who posts more on the average? Those who have posted, or those who haven't? ====== ntulip I haven't posted much, but I think it should be more like half on both. I cannot imagine people are too stupid to click the submit button if they want to post their 2 cents. ~~~ joshuacc I agree with you that people are not too stupid to click the submit button, but I agree that the number of people who have posted at least once is in the neighborhood of 50% on both sides of the scale. The present disclosure relates generally to interventional procedures and more specifically to dilation of hollow organs. In the field of medicine, interventional procedures involve the use of minimal access techniques to access a target organ. Minimal access techniques include laparoscopic, arthroscopic and endoscopic surgical techniques. Laparoscopic surgery involves making a small incision and passing instruments through trocars to access the target organ. The term "minimal access surgery" is used to refer to a wide variety of procedures performed through trocars to achieve access. Endoscopic surgery involves percutaneous placement of trocars into a body cavity to provide access to an internal body cavity such as the peritoneal cavity. Many procedures that were performed in the past are now performed using a minimal access technique. One endoscopic surgical procedure involves a surgical knife that is inserted through one trocar and is used to cut tissue. The liver is the largest and most important portal vein-associated organ. It is critical to many bodily functions and is necessary for the functioning of other vital organs of the body. In many disease states of the body, the liver becomes enlarged and may result in the formation of a liver tumor known as a hepatocellular carcinoma. A hepatocellular carcinoma can be removed or otherwise treated using a minimal access procedure that cuts open the liver through one or more surgical incisions. It is conventional to insert a trocar or other instrument into the interior of the body and then insert a laparoscope through the trocar to allow the surgeon to monitor the internal surgical area. Minimally invasive techniques for the treatment
